Intern 2

Yes I do if I ever need anything to help out with one of my colleagues I can ask them and they will tend to give me advice on what I need to do or I can ask the managers directly and say what is it you're asking me to do and then they'll tell me well we need you to do this, that and the other and then I will be like oh ok and then I can get on with it.

Favourite part of the job I'd say is when I'm able to make up the new spreadsheets because then I can say this is mine, this is what I've done, and then being able to say, yes this works, it's made everything a lot easier, just that can go through and then everyone can use that.

Representative from Bradford Royal Infirmary/Support Worker

Having somebody with special needs in their company is quite, quite good because it's sustainable, they do, they're, they're very loyal, they're very, you know, the, the people that I've worked with are always on time, they are very good at doing the job, they are very good at doing systematic training, and generally, generally done jobs what employers probably don't want other people to do. My role as like a support worker really, to, so to come and support people in the role, break the tasks, tasks down, go do one to one meetings with them, appraisals, any training they have on site, look at the job role, if the job changes, they come in and job, job training in that job, so breaking the task down to minutest detail as possible. I think it's a, it's a fulfilling for them cos it makes them feel part of the community, makes them feel part of life in itself, because some people with learning disabilities say they can't do anything, but when they give it, give it a chance and given the choices out, out there, there are jobs what they can do, and being able to feel good about themselves I would tell them to apply even if it's through to us or Project Search, you know, to get the training to do, be able to do the job.
